When Tayal boys are fifteen, they follow their fathers on hunting and fishing expeditions. They learn to use the bow and arrow, to set traps, to fish with the fish-gig, to handle the cutlass and sabre and to fight. Little girls follow the women to the fields, help in the housework and learn to weave.

In the village of Namaka I observed one extraordinarily large house occupying an area of about 140 square meters. It was the community sleeping-house for all unmarried men. The interior has a floor of bamboos. A fireplace is found in the center. There are no partition walls to mark off rooms. The house is open on two sides and on the remaining two the roof slopes down quite low and provides some protection against bad weather. As many as 85 skulls, all of the Chinese, were suspended from the ceiling. All of the men of the village were armed with daggers approximately 40 centimeters long.
